The Age of Conquest

The world was not built by peace. It was built by those who conquered it.

The year was 1947, an era when the world had become a battlefield of steel, fire, and ambition.

Across the continent stood the Golden Empire, the greatest superpower in human history. Its golden banners flew over countless conquered territories, and its armies marched across borders as if the lands beyond them had already belonged to the throne. Nation after nation had fallen beneath its unstoppable military might, their flags torn down and replaced with the imperial insignia.

The Empire possessed weapons beyond the imagination of ordinary nations. Towering super-heavy tanks, massive steel fortresses on tracks, crushed everything in their path. Enormous bombers darkened the skies, carrying enough firepower to turn entire cities into burning ruins. Its war machines were not merely weapons; they were symbols of the Empire's absolute dominance.

The Imperial High Command called its campaigns the Unification Wars.

They claimed that the Empire was bringing order to a divided world, uniting weaker nations beneath one powerful civilization. To the conquered, however, it was nothing more than colonialism disguised as glory——a war of occupation, exploitation, and endless bloodshed.

But not every nation was willing to kneel.

Beyond the Empire's expanding borders, resistance movements began to rise. Small republics, former kingdoms, and occupied territories formed fragile alliances, determined to reclaim their freedom. Their armies possessed no colossal tanks or enormous strategic bombers. They fought with conventional tanks, ordinary fighter aircraft, aging artillery, and whatever weapons they could salvage from the ruins of their homeland.

Against the Empire's overwhelming industrial power, their chances of victory seemed almost nonexistent.

Yet they continued to fight.

For every imperial tank that crossed their borders, another resistance ambush awaited. For every bomber that appeared above their cities, their pilots climbed into the skies with outdated aircraft, knowing that many would never return. They were outnumbered, outgunned, and surrounded by enemies who believed their defeat was inevitable.

But history had never been written by strength alone.

As the Golden Empire prepared to launch its greatest military campaign yet, a new question began to haunt the continent:

Would the Golden Empire unite the world under its eternal rule——or would the nations it sought to conquer become the very force that brought its golden age to an end?

The Age of Golden Empire had begun.

And the world would soon learn that even the mightiest empire could bleed.
